Illusion of separation

The idea that art can heal was introduced to Donna through her association with the Center for Health Design and the National Symposium on Healthcare Design.

Her studies of healing environments took her to a real example of a hospital that used the principles of design to calm and heal their patients.

The North Hawaii Community Hospital combines Eastern and Western approaches to medicine and is founded on a holistic approach to health care. It was her tour of this facility that inspired her to study the principles of energy, healing and art.

Her role as a facility planner and designer for orthopedic groups had her continually searching for practical and affordable solutions to create healing through the facility.

"I used to pray for ways to use design and art to support the healing process."

Donna landed a dream position in India studying the Vedic science of energy transmission. "I was initiated as a healer and encouraged to paint. It made sense that the energy coming from the hands of a healer could radiate through material and the artwork. In the study of consciousness we are taught that everything is energy and at some level that energy is interconnected. I visited several temples in India and learned there is an ancient science of using the environment to radiate conscious energy that helps a person evolve."

When Donna got home, she had her next level of this experience. "Sacred materials were materializing in my home and through my skin. These experiences gave me a tangible experience of energy. I finally experienced the understanding of conscious energy and its ability to connect beyond time and space. Now I could see that my artwork held the potential to contribute and enrich that lives of others."

"After all the truly unexplainable incidents that led up to the creation of my art collection, I found the simplicity of healing. When you feel good it changes how you perceive your life. If you see my artwork and smile- then I know my prayers have been answered."
